London (CNN Business) Ford's plan to make the United Kingdom its sole European manufacturing hub is facing increased uncertainty after it was forced to cancel the launch of one of its most important new models, the region's largest-selling car. Ford's announcement on Friday that it would stop making vehicles in Europe because of Brexit risks having wider repercussions for its plans to remain one of the world's biggest carmakers, a role that would become even more important should the United States shift its focus away from its own industry. The company said it could continue to make engines for Europe. It said that it was the first North American automaker to have a manufacturing site in Europe for 50 years. The announcement cast doubt on the future of a car plant Ford has been preparing to build near the English port of Dearborn, Michigan. The Michigan plant will act as a hub to build models made at plants in Europe and Asia for sales in the United States. Ford's European vehicles and services production has expanded dramatically in recent years. The plant at Bridgend in Wales, for example, has a production capacity of 400,000 cars a year. In June, it produced more than 200,000 cars, far more than 3da54e8ca3
