Nanobeam nanomechanical resonators for ultrasensitive biochemical assays. Biomass-receptor interactions are frequently analyzed using nanomechanical sensors since they enable very high sensitivities. Their operation is based on the displacement of the resonating structure through binding of an analyte by mass-actuation. Here, we show that the frequency sensitivity of a nanobeam resonator to mass loading can be several orders of magnitude better than previously demonstrated, without affecting the functionality. Surface and bulk silicon nanobeams and cantilevers are studied as models. Operating at a detection limit of about 10(-13) g (25 pN per mass action), the sensitivities are about 40 times better than that of bare silicon nanobeam. Binding is detected by electron beam lithography and simply done by filling the mass well with specific substances. Analyte immobilization is electrodeposited in a separate zone without changing the reaction, which allows the use of resonator structures in arrays. Concentration analysis is achieved by a combination of displacement and excitation of the second harmonic mode. NEW YORK (AP) — Donald Trump is showcasing his campaign as a big economic success, winning praise in the media and from rival campaigns while pushing Democrats to reckon with the same issues. On the eve of Tuesday's Super Tuesday primaries, the Republican nominee is fueling speculation that he could ultimately best the Democratic nominee, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, in the general election. But he risks injecting more discord into an already sour campaign season if some of his supporters continue to spark major clashes with the press. ADVERTISEMENT "What's very different is that there's been no Democrat that has done anything like what he's been doing," former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani said Monday. "I think what he's doing is very smart politically." "What Hillary and Bernie have in common is that they're both good women and both would be better off shutting up and letting Trump do what he does much better than either of them ever could." Trump has been doing a great job uniting the party. He has a commanding delegate lead heading into Tuesday's contests with 703 delegates. At the same time, he is on a roll when it comes to campaigning, which is a core tenet of his campaign. In Philadelphia on Monday, Trump touched on everything from plans
