Identification of Bacillus subtilis as a novel source of sclerotigenin, a novel toxin produced by natural isolates of Sclerotinia sclerotiorum. The genus Bacillus has received significant attention in recent years because of its diversity, metabolic versatility and commercial importance. Bacillus subtilis and other species of the genus have been used to facilitate the production of recombinant proteins. On the other hand, Bacillus species are used as a biological control agent against fungal plant pathogens. Despite the beneficial use of Bacillus species in agriculture, there is still very little information on the effects of their proteolytic enzymes on pathogenic fungi. Here, we report that a few natural isolates of Sclerotin
