The invention relates to an integrated device, comprising a semiconductor circuit provided with electrodes allowing the injection and the reading of the circuit, in particular of a memory circuit, the electrodes being connected to respective biasing circuits that allow the biasing of the circuit with a reference potential, to an interface circuit having an input and an output allowing the input and output of the circuit, the input and output being connected respectively to an electrode of the circuit and to a biasing circuit connected to a reference potential, and an auxiliary circuit provided with a reference input and a feedback input allowing the biasing of the auxiliary circuit with a constant reference potential. The invention finds a particular application in the field of the metrology of the cells of an electrically programmable read-only memory, or, generally, of a programmable memory. In metrology, the term "cell" is understood as meaning the elementary unit of a memory which can be, for example, a transistor, a transistor/charge-storing capacitor or a NVM, or combinations thereof. There exist devices allowing the biasing of the cells of a memory. One such device is for example shown and described in patent document FR-2.804.195. This document, in particular, describes a semiconductor circuit comprising a memory array provided with biasing circuits, and comprising an integrated circuit for biasing. The biasing circuits are connected to biasing devices of the array, and comprise devices having input and output means allowing the connection of the biasing devices with the biasing circuit. The integrated circuit for biasing comprises input means allowing the biasing of the integrated circuit with a reference potential. The biasing circuit comprises feedback means allowing the biasing of the input means with a constant reference potential. Such a device allows biasing of an array of memory cells with a constant reference potential. This device, however, has the drawback of imposing, on the array of cells of a memory, the use of a dedicated integrated circuit for biasing.In the past, in order to protect a magnetic disk, a magnetic disk apparatus has provided a magnetic disk device with a mechanism for holding the magnetic disk firmly and reliably. With this mechanism, the magnetic disk device is provided with a so-called window portion on a peripheral portion of a rotating sleeve that holds the magnetic disk. The window portion includes a top plate having an opening as a window, and a stopper. In this way, the window portion prevents the magnetic disk from being dislodged
