Q: How to differentiate between List of List> in the whole application I am having a structure which is a generic List of a generic List of Person. eg. List> We are using it to do the following things 1: Do some processing on the data. 2: Iterate over the List>. For Number 1: We did this using Iterable. for (Person person : persons) { process(person) } Now we want to do the processing only for the List which is in the List> using the

---

Iterable class. Any help appreciated.

A: You can use `collection.stream()`, like this

List persons =...; List> res = persons.stream().filter(p -> p instanceof List).map(List::of).collect(Collectors.toList());

//do the processing here or you can, if you have the original `List>` and just want to iterate over the list with a for loop, you can use

List list =...; for (List res : list) { //process elements }

welcome to the world of FaMGs!
As others have mentioned in other thread, the unique thing about FaMG is that you get to play with the characters and the scenario playing mostly as the Anarchists. But don't take it too literally, we have many groups that play together, and there is a lot of fun in mixing things up and the character mix doesn't really matter, it's about the group and how they work together. We have a long-standing reputation of an enthusiastic and talented group that is happy to teach people to play. Our GM has years of experience running FaMGs, and as the adage goes, if you aren't careful when you teach the wrong person how to fix a car, they'll end up using two new parts and not fixing anything. One thing I've learned from my GM is that if you have students that are experienced at running games, it's always better to have them run FaMGs because the experience helps (and the GM who runs them gets credit for that too). I hope you have a good time with us,

---

I do get frustrated with players sometimes that make bad decisions with the common currency or don't follow the rules, but I think that is part of the game, and I'm glad I get to show people where they should be going. I hope the group and GM aren't put off your reading by the picture here. As a comment on the picture, I have played in the past in groups that used the Anarchy cards, so I don't mind not having them in this game. And in the internet group, I suspect most of us don't really care, since we prefer having more character options, so those would just get in the way. The secret advantage of the Anarchy cards was that they did allow some flexibility with your PCs. I'm hoping this game will be at the level of other old-school games that I've played in, where the GM needs to put time into describing things and checking if that info is correct. And I'm adding a warning about this game (and possibly others that I haven't played): They may be a bit too lax in what you can do with player character progression (I suspect this is a quality game from its design and play-testing). For example, I'm sure I'm going to miss rules during a battle because the characters are not specified to have any particular skills. We are just happy that we are still

---
